MANUFACTURER'S REPORT

submitted by SVS Vision

An Eye Exam. It sounds simple and somewhere between “one of these days” and “when I can’t see as clearly,” you’ll get one, right? If you’re like many people, you put it off until you have a physical symptom – can’t see as well as you used to, squinting, headaches, etc. But make no mistake a complete eye exam each and every year is about more than just getting new glasses or contact lenses.

Did you know that the working blood vessels of your own body can be directly viewed by your eye doctor during an eye exam? This allows early detection of diseases such as diabetes and high blood pressure. Because an eye exam is painless and shameless, more people see their optometrist annually than those who have annual physicals. As a result, it is not at all uncommon for patients to have these diseases detected during their eye exam, and often before they have any symptoms whatsoever. Early detection and treatment can prevent blindness and other serious health issues as well as save on medical claims.

According to the Prevent Blindness organization, there are nearly 700,000 work related eye injuries each year at a cost exceeding $4 billion. 90% of those injuries could be prevented with the use of OSHA approved safety eyewear. Preventing just one such injury can save a company thousands.

Are regular eye exams important?
Yes! In addition to ensuring you see your best, here are some conditions regularly detected during a routine eye exam:

- High Blood Pressure
30% of patients are diagnosed during a routine eye exam
- Cataracts
40% of individuals between 52 and 64 are affected.
- Glaucoma
3 million Americans over age 40 are affected.
- Diabetic Retinopathy
7 million are affected in the US.
- Macular Degeneration
The leading cause of blindness for Americans over age 60.

Studies show people with undiagnosed diabetes or hypertension who received an eye exam had a total expenditure of $5,109 less than those who did not.

Having a vision insurance program can save you and your employees on the ever rising cost of medical care.
